→ Activities of Daily Living

Daily tasks are usually called Activities of Daily Living by the health care community. They are personal care and mobility activities that are performed daily and are necessary for independent living.

Activities of Daily Living are not always defined the same but usually include:

- feeding
- dressing
- bathing
- grooming
- moving from a bed to a chair (also called transferring)
- toileting
- walking

Professionals use a scale of a person's ability to perform these tasks, along with the Instrumental Activities of Daily Living (IADL), as evidence of their ability to live and function independently and they often serve as indicators of eligibility for assistance, both financial and hands-on, and as eligibility for long-term care placement, whether home and community based care, assisted living or nursing home care.
